Suitability of gold nanoparticles coated with protein-based biomolecules for biological imaging and tissue engineering. The use of nanoparticles for biological imaging and tissue engineering requires their high stability and biocompatibility. Gold nanoparticles (GNPs) hold particular promise for these applications because of their chemical inertness and biocompatibility. However, the opsonization of GNPs by proteins (e.g. plasma proteins and the complementary system of the immune system) is known to induce clearance from the circulation. In order to avoid this problem, in the present study, we attempted to coat GNPs with human serum albumin (HSA), bovine serum albumin (BSA) or rabbit anti-fibronectin polyclonal antibody (r-FnAb), all of which represent a widely used carrier for biomedical application. We prepared and characterized GNPs with each of these proteins. We then
